

Dust Networks Recognized by WSJ

Contributed by Administrator
Last Updated Sunday, 08 October 2006

Congratulations! Dust Networks, Hayward, CA based startup founded by former Cal Berkeley Professor Kris Pister, was announced as one of the recipients of The Wall Street Journal's 2006 Global Technology Innovation Awards. The winners of the competition were announced on September 11, 2006. Dust Networks was named a runner-up in the wireless category. More than 600 entries from around the world were considered for the prestigious awards. These awards recognize technological breakthroughs by individuals, companies and organizations around the world in a wide range of areas, including medicine and medical devices, wireless, security, consumer electronics, semiconductors and others. Read more here